Description

Developed over thousands of years, paved by the tremendous power of water: even in ancient Egypt, alluvial soils were considered a promising blessing for bountiful harvests. Sediment removal created extremely nutrient-rich young soil along coasts, rivers or lakes, which Justin Lundquist describes as the source of his idea for the impressive Boker Plus Alluvial All Black. The nature-loving knife designer from the USA has been fascinated by knives since he was four and has been successfully implementing his own designs since 2013. Flooded with inspiration, in this first joint project with Boker he overturned the laws of nature and brought new life to the world of automatic knives with the slim Gentleman Folder. The clip point blade from D2 is opened and unlocked with a push button. The push button and blade axle screw are embedded in the aluminum handle so that the thumb gets additional support during use. The solid alluvial soil is cited by the front, mostly smooth grip section, while the fine texturing in the rear grip section picks up the inflowing sediments. The bordered tip-up (r) clip allows deep carry and rounds off the discreet, earthy appearance of the automatic knife.
